the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are employed in the public sector has increased from 10.5 million to 12.5 million, and the number of people in the public sector who are employed in health care has increased from 2.5 million to 3.5 million (Department of Health 2000).

There are a number of reasons why the public sector has expanded in the UK. One reason is that the population is ageing, and the number of people who are dependent on the state is increasing. Another reason is that the government has increased its spending on health care, and this has led to an increase in the number of people employed in the public sector. A third reason is that the private sector has not been able to meet the demand for health care services, and this has led to an increase in the number of people employed in the public sector.

The expansion of the public sector has led to a number of challenges for the government. One challenge is that the public sector is becoming more expensive, and this is putting pressure on the government's budget. Another challenge is that the public sector is becoming more bureaucratic, and this is making it more difficult to deliver services to the public. A third challenge is that the public sector is becoming more fragmented, and this is making it more difficult to coordinate services.

There are a number of ways in which the government can address these challenges. One way is to increase the efficiency of the public sector, and this can be done by introducing competition and by encouraging innovation. Another way is to increase the transparency of the public sector, and this can be done by publishing information about the government's spending and by involving the public in decision-making. A third way is to reform the public sector, and this can be done by merging different departments and by creating new agencies.

The government has taken a number of steps to address these challenges. In 1997, the government introduced a new system of public sector accounting, and this has led to an increase in the transparency of the public sector. In 1998, the government introduced a new system of public sector management, and this has led to an increase in the efficiency of the public sector. In 1999, the government introduced a new system of public sector reform, and this has led to an increase in the coordination of services.

There are a number of challenges that the government will continue to face in the future. One challenge is that the public sector is becoming more expensive, and this is putting pressure on the government's budget. Another challenge is that the public sector is becoming more bureaucratic, and this is making it more difficult to deliver services to the public. A third challenge is that the public sector is becoming more fragmented, and this is making it more difficult to coordinate services.
